LILLIE LANGTRY

Daughter of the Dean of Jersey, Lillie Langtry stunned everyone with her beauty and audacious behaviour and her exploits were numerous. Lillie was extremely well known in high society in London, where she had made the acquaintance of almost all the eminent people of the day including royalty, politicians, artists and writers. Several artists painted her portrait, most notably Millais, who painted her holding a flower called a "Jersey Lily", by which she herself became known. Oscar Wilde fell in love with her but her most notable liaison was with the future King Edward VII. Her friendship with Sarah Bernhardt, a previous mistress of the prince, enabled her to start on her famous career as an actress.

As Rosalind in "As You Like It", her favourite acting role, she outraged the American critics by displaying her legs in cross-gartered tights instead of traditional high boots and trunks. An admirer Judge Roy Bean, a saloon-keeper with railway construction camps, treasured her photograph and loved her from a distance. Bean named the American town Langtry in Texas after her. There, he was elected Justice of the Peace and over his doorway he had misspelled, The Lily Langtry Saloon. Lillie eventually visited the spot. Bean was, by that time dead and she was presented with his revolver. The State of Texas donated eight thousand dollars for the restoration of the saloon in 1939.
